A public library is a quiet place where people read, study, and borrow books. Many visitors come in after school or work and spend a little time there. Some sit at tables and write notes. Others look for stories, cook books, or travel guides on the shelves. A library card is often free and easy to get. After a person chooses a book, the book can go home for some days. Later, it must come back so another reader can use it. This simple system helps many people share knowledge, ideas, and pleasure from reading.

After 90 seconds, your work will be saved automatically.

H1

I am writing about my appointment at the health center this afternoon. The message says my visit is at two o'clock, but my work meeting was moved to the same time this morning. Could you please give me a later appointment today? If that is not possible, I can come tomorrow morning instead.

On paper: read for 30 seconds, cover the passage, then rewrite it in your own words in 90 seconds.

YOUR RESPONSE

H2

The apartment tenant reported that the bedroom window would not close properly after yesterday's storm. Because cold air was coming in all night, he slept badly and became worried about rain damaging the floor. The building office said a repair worker can come tomorrow morning, so he moved the desk away from the window and covered it with a sheet.

On paper: read for 30 seconds, cover the passage, then rewrite it in your own words in 90 seconds.

YOUR RESPONSE

H3

I appreciate the conference booking you arranged for next month. After checking the schedule more carefully, I realized my presentation has been moved to the final afternoon instead of the opening day. Since I no longer need to arrive early, could you contact the hotel and ask whether one night can be removed from the reservation without any penalty or extra charge?

On paper: read for 30 seconds, cover the passage, then rewrite it in your own words in 90 seconds.

Many towns are considering deposit return schemes for drink bottles and cans, and I believe this is a sensible step. Under these schemes, shoppers pay a small extra amount when they buy a drink and get it back when they return the empty container. Some people dislike the idea because it adds a step to daily life, but the system can improve habits in a practical way. It gives a simple reason to return packaging instead of throwing it away, and that matters in places where streets, parks, and beaches often collect litter.

A deposit scheme can also make recycling work better, not just look better. When bottles and cans are returned separately, they are usually cleaner than mixed waste from a general bin. Cleaner material is easier to reuse, so less is lost during sorting. This can reduce waste and lower the cost of dealing with rubbish later. In addition, people who do not usually think about the environment may still respond to the small payment, which means the scheme can change behavior without long campaigns or repeated warnings.

There are, of course, problems. Small shops may need space to store returned containers, and busy customers may not want to stand in line to use a machine. If return points are too far away, the system will annoy people rather than help them. However, these are design problems, not reasons to reject the idea completely. Local authorities and stores can share the work by providing enough collection points and clear rules.

Overall, a deposit return scheme is not a complete answer to packaging waste, but it is a useful tool. It encourages responsibility, improves the quality of recycling, and can make public spaces cleaner. For these reasons, towns should introduce such schemes and improve them over time.
